VIG DEVELOPED MARKET GOVERNMENT BOND INVESTMENT FUND

A series HUF MONTHLY report - 2026 OCTOBER (made on: 10/31/2026)

INVESTMENT POLICY OF THE FUND

MARKET SUMMARY

In October, three mutually reinforcing forces shaped the money and capital markets: doubts about the finance ability of the investment cycle linked to artificial intelligence, persistently high real yields, and oil prices above $110 due to the escalation in the Middle East. At its October meeting, the Federal Reserve kept its benchmark interest rates unchanged, even though an interest rate hike had been priced in just a month earlier. The 10-year yield fell from a peak of 5.3% to below 5%. This was not driven by disinflation, but rather by expectations of a slowdown in AI-related bond issuance. Although the S&P 500 hit a new high early in the month, this was followed by the longest losing streak for semiconductor stocks since 2008. The main risk remains the November 3 midterm elections and the subsequent likelihood of a U.S. military strike against Iran. In Europe, inflation has remained above 3%, shifting the balance within the European Central Bank toward further tightening. The French yield spread widened to more than 170 basis points, and the 10-year yield temporarily exceeded 5%. The auto and luxury sectors were dragged down by weak Chinese demand, while AI-related electric vehicle stocks were weighed down by global market sentiment.
The Fund's value rose by 3.1% in October - outperforming the benchmark index by 37 basis points - as global bond market yields began to decline from their previous peaks. Energy prices remained persistently high ahead of the US midterm elections in November; however, investors continue to anticipate a significant correction in energy prices over the short to medium term, which could also drive bond yields lower. Regarding the Fund's composition, we reduced our exposure to 30-year UK government bonds following their strong performance in October. The Fund's positioning is moderately positive, following the significant rise in yields seen recently.
