MARKET SUMMARY

In January, Polish bonds experienced a volatile month: in the first half of the month, the yield curve moved lower, followed by opposite movements in the market, but overall regarding the main maturities, yield curve ended the month a few basis points lower. Yield changes were shaped by international, predominantly US macro data: investors try to price in when major central banks may start cutting base rates, and what size can be expected during the course of 2024. As stronger than expected US macro data came to light, optimism from the very beginning of the year was over and yields increased from lowest points seen in January. At the beginning of the month, the Polish central bank kept the base rate unchanged, so it remained at 5,75% in line with market expectations. The communication of the central bank's governor was somewhat hawkish; according to the Monetary Council, the current economic situation is favorable, and at the beginning of the year, disinflation could be stronger than indicated in the latest central bank publication. However, this larger decrease is expected to be temporary, as in the second half of the year, the inflation rate could rise again to around 6-8%. Moving on with the economic data, according to the first Bloomberg opinion poll of the year, the economy could have grown by 0.5% in 2023 and a 2.9% economic growth may come in 2024. The Purchasing Managers' Index (PMI) decreased to 47,1 in January from the previous month's 47.4, below the market expectations. The index is still below the 50 threshold, indicating a contraction, as both output and new orders continued to decline due to the uncertain economic environment. Industrial production recorded a 3.9% decline in the last month of the previous year, but this was above market expectations indicating a 5% drop. The current account balance continued to improve, with the 12-month rolling balance reaching 1.4% of GDP by November.
